11:00-12:00 What You Know is Just as Important as HOW you know it

— the third workshop in the "Getting to Know Your Students: Race and Class in the Classroom" series, a Faculty Learning Certificate series

(this workshop will be repeated on Thursday)

For many students raised in working-class and closely-knit ethnic backgrounds, college can present enormous communication problems. It seems no matter how much they try to explain their ideas, their professors don't seem to understand them or want "more detail." What both student and teacher often fail to recognize is that this may very well be the first time this student has been asked to communicate with someone outside of his/her community. As a result the student often uses implicit language that would make perfect sense to someone at home but is lost on the outside world. Getting students past this hurdle can be the difference between their ideas being heard by a larger audience or forever trapped within their immediate social circle, and getting students past this hurdle will be the focus of session two.

How do I create an online classroom community?

— the second workshop in the "Introduction to Teaching Online Course", a Faculty Learning Certificate series

This session will provide ways to promote interaction and build community between students who are separated by space and time. Topics will include the importance of introductory and first week activities, netiquette guidelines, and modes of communication.

2:30-3:30 Creating instructional videos with Jing
— the first of three workshops on “Using Multimedia in the Classroom: Easy as 1-2-3!”
Jing is an intuitive screen capture program for creating still shots or videos of computer-based material. With this versatile tool, you can make short videos that show how to access your course home page in MyCCP, how to submit materials for an online course, or how to complete a course assignment! An electronic file and a computer with a microphone are all you need.
